

It's still fresh to our memory that we have witnessed George Floyd's murder case by excessive abuse of police brutality. The video of the footage spread around the world overnight, and even though the incident occurred during COVID-19's first ever quarantine period, it caught an attention for the humanity and black lives, and people protested around the globe. At that time, I was living in a apartment facing Flatbush Ave, and I had seen the protests out of my window every week.

What was remarkable was that while they deliver their message, they were using Public Enemy's "Fight the Power" in the background. The song came out in the 90's (1989) when the Rodney King's incident went the court case and the movement for the rise of black culture came into play hugely. It was 30+ years ago.
